One of the discouraging aspects of being engaged in the business of manufacturing automobiles must be the knowledge that when a new model is introduced to the public, it has already been outmoded on the drawing boards of the designers, who work many months and sometimes years ahead of the production department. Changes in automobiles, modern manufacturing techniques being what they are, can no longer be made overnight as in the old days of hand craftsmanship.

That some manufacturers, especially in what is somewhat humorously described as the low-priced field, will make radical changes in mechanical design and appearance next year was the worst kept secret of the year, thanks to the Wall Street Journal. The free-swinging era of competition in which the industry is currently operating leaves no doubt that next year's models will be the best ever produced. There is nothing like competition to spur technological progress.
